CONCEPT APPLICATION

In both 1940 and 1944, the Republican party platform called for a constitutional amendment to limit a president to two terms. The Republicans, however, were unable to defeat the incumbent FDR at the polls. Then, in 1946, for the first time in almost two decades, they gained control of Congress. Only once during the next forty years would both Houses of Congress belong to the Republicans. One of the Republicans' first priorities in 1946 was a constitutional amendment to prevent any future president from gaining a Roosevelt-type hold on the White House. The ensuing controversy renewed a debate which began in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and in the subsequent state ratifying conventions. At the Constitutional Convention, the question of presidential tenure occupied extensive time and severely tried the patience of many of the Founding Fathers. Congress began its own struggle with the question in 1803, when the first proposal to limit presidential tenure was introduced. The idea of changing the length of the presidential term appeared in 1808. Resolutions proposing a variety of limitations followed, seeking to gain approval for a single one, four, five, six, seven, and eight-year term. In 1824 and again in 1826, the Senate approved resolutions calling for a two-term limit, but they died in the House. At the outset of the Civil War, the Congress of the Confederate States of America adopted a constitution limiting the president of the Confederacy to a single six-year term.
